The Daily Press

HONGKONG, OCTOBER 27th, 1875.

In the Memorial of the T'ung-hi Yunnan on the right of foreigners to travel in the interior of China, and the Imperial Decree in response to it, there is nothing really satisfactory discoverable. The Yunnan outrage is distinctly referred to, but no trace of regret for the brutal murder of Mr. Mangray is to be found in either document. There is one assumption in the Memorial which is eminently characteristic of Chinese officialdom. Referring to the Yunnan Commission of Inquiry, it says: "In the case of the British Interpreter, Mangray, who was murdered of the frontier of Yunnan, your servants have had the honour to receive a Decree from Your Majesty, directing Mr. Han-chang to proceed thither to make inquiry and take action—How it was that he came to be murdered, there will, of course, be no difficulty in establishing." There ought, not perhaps, to be much difficulty in establishing the facts of the murder, but it is extremely probable that after the lapse of time since the occurrence it will be found that the circumstances are involved in a good deal of obscurity. The unaccountable delay which has taken place will, it is to be feared, render the inquiry practically worthless. In fact, there is some doubt whether it may not end in "smoke, the real criminals sleeping all together, as for the despatch of Messrs. Grosvenor and Baines to Yunnan at this late hour of day, it can be productive of little good, and may be the means of involving them in serious peril. It is not likely that Mr. Straits will regard with much equanimity the representatives of the Power he has injured and insulted, and may not care to restrain his unruly followers from offering violence to them.

It is also noticeable that neither in the Memorial nor the Decree is there any definite promise of justice for the outrage. It is treated as a most ordinary affair, and no pretence is made of regarding the murder as a deplorable crime. The language of the Imperial Decree in reference to the most superficial and off-hand. "We have already appointed Mr. Han-chang to proceed without delay, in order to ascertain by whom the murder was committed and to take action," it says. "The matter is treated as lightly as possible, in order that it may be shown that such a petty affair as the murder of the British Interpreter, Mangray, cannot be suffered to occupy much of the Imperial attention. Mr. Han-chang is ordered to inquire and take action," not to inquire and execute justice. The order may amount to the same thing, but it has been carefully worded, probably, to preserve the Imperial dignity at all hazards, even at the risk of offending the British Government. If, however, it should prove itself to be a mere empty promise, it would be a most adequate punishment for the murder of Mr. Mangray, should they be captured, this ritual attempt to preserve pretensions which every civilized nation treats with the contempt and derision they merit might perhaps be passed over, did it not have an injurious effect on the native mind. It is necessary, if peaceful relations are to be preserved between England and China, that the people of the latter country should be taught to treat foreigners with more respect. Of late years there has been manifested in almost all parts of the Empire an inclination to offer violence and insult to foreigners, and cases of this character have been particularly numerous during this year. The increase in these displays of antipathy and hostility are generally, and with great show of reason, attributed to the declining influence of Great Britain in China. The policy of representatives has lately been of such a weak and indecisive character that they have naturally lost ground at Peking, and which may prove difficult to recover. The people take their cue from the officials, and when they feel their treating foreigners with diminished deference they naturally conclude that the occupier of the Dragon Throne has forsaken his former pre-eminence, and that the outer nations (his vassals) are no longer to be feared.

Judging from the tone of the Imperial Decree above alluded to, there is but faint hope of any apology from the Chinese Government being published in the Peking Gazette. This point is, it is to be feared, among those abandoned by Mr. Wade. At all events, there is no intimation that it has been conceded. It is easy to imagine the reluctance with which the Imperial Government would yield on a question to which it attaches so much importance. The officials would doubtless represent to Mr. Wade that such a proceeding was most repugnant to their traditions, and, above all, was calculated to impair the prestige and authority of the Government with the people. But whatever truth there is in such arguments, they should not have been allowed to come in the way of the British demands. Without desiring in any degree to weaken the authority of the Chinese Government over the people, England has a purpose to serve in requiring this concession. The publication in the Peking Gazette of an expression of regret for the unprovoked attack on Colonel Baines's Expedition and on the shameful assassination of Mr. Mangray, would do much to convince the Chinese of all ranks that English travellers in China cannot safely be assailed and insulted, and that the Peking Government had determined to protect them in the future. Such an effect will certainly, however, not be produced by the injunction contained in the Decree under notice. In the governors of provinces are enjoined that "wherever persons provided with passports enter their districts, it is incumbent upon them to take measures effectively, as circumstances may direct, in conformity with the Treaty provisions." By this means tranquillity will be secured to Chinese and foreigners alike, and cases of misunderstanding will be prevented from arising. It will be observed that this is so worded as to make it appear that the measures were to be taken primarily on behalf of the Chinese. It is clear that they should not come into collision with the troubles of the country. The whole thing—both the Memorial and the Decree—reads very much like a farce, and induces the unpleasant belief that the British representative has been very considerably outwitted. We only hope that this expectation may turn out unfounded, but, in any case, the terms of settlement, when published, will only confirm it.

Two expeditions from London to New Orleans are now, it is stated, being projected. One of them contemplates the visit of a steamship to a station on the eastern coast of the island. Many persons have expressed a desire to take part in the expedition.

that at present. He would take care, however, that the recommendation was forwarded to the proper quarter. This Court could not deal with it. There were facts connected with the case which should be presented to the jury, but which would be put before the Governor in Council when he came to deal with the case. Prisoner had been in a state of mind that would be considered. At present he had no alternative, but to sentence prisoner to death. He was not now in a position to hold any hope of mercy. The Lordship then passed sentences of death in the usual manner.

This concluded the session.
